ESSILOR AND LUXOTTICA, SEEING EYE TO EYE

Alstom, Technip, Rhodia... Once bitten, twice shy, as the saying goes. And in France, the mere mention of the word "merger" is enough to make companies recoil, even when the announced combination is presumably welcome news for French industry. Essilor, the number-one eyeglass lens producer in the world will combine with the Italian company Luxottica, an eyeglass frames manufacturer, to create the worldwide leader in the eyeglass sector, with a market capitalization of over €50 billion. Although the two companies are insisting that this will be a merger of equals, the center of gravity will nevertheless be shifted from Milan to Paris. "The headquarters of the newly combined company will be in France, and its shares will be listed on the Paris stock market," says Cédric Rossi, financial analyst with Bryan Garnier.

Four years after the start of negotiations, the outcome appears to be positive. Essilor is bringing its innovation and production capacities to the table, whereas Luxottica is contributing a large range of high-end brands and a colossal distribution network. The French company's 32 factories will be combined with the Italian company's 8,000 points of sale; the technology of Varilux lenses, with the renowned brand names Ray-Ban and Persol... The two companies will form a symbiotic relationship that will have no impact on Essilor's global industrial footprint or its four plants in France, a spokesperson assures us. The lens producer, having missed the boat on vertical integration and retail sales, has attempted to catch up by acquiring websites. At end of 2015, Essilor generated €220 million in revenues through online sales. In 2016, it purchased two new market players in an effort to reach its €400 million goal by 2018.

“But the recipe for success has many ingredients; it involves a combination of online offers and physical stores,” comments Cédric Rossi. The newly combined EssilorLuxottica should have the necessary arsenal in this respect. The proposed combination will need to overcome two obstacles. First, the competition authorities, as the new company would become the leading supplier for many opticians. Next, the combination between these two companies, with their strong individual cultures, will have to be successful in order avoid tensions in the distribution of the various positions.
