Financial Times: NYSE boosts case for Deutsche Börse

By Helen Thomas, Telis Demos and Francesco Guerrera in New York, April 24, 2011, 23:00

NYSE Euronext is set to increase by up to a third its forecast for cost savings from a deal with Deutsche Börse, as the US exchange operator raises the stakes in efforts to counter an $11.3bn bid from Nasdaq OMX and Intercontinental-Exchange.

Duncan Niederauer, chief executive of NYSE, told the Financial Times the companies now believed they could find “closer to €400m” in cost savings than the €300m unveiled in February.

That suggests total synergies could reach about €500m ($728m), with revenue opportunities from the deal, compared with the $740m in net synergies touted by Nasdaq and ICE, most of which is cost-cutting.

He also revealed that NYSE and Deutsche Börse estimated that their biggest customers would save at least $3bn through the combination of the exchanges’ two European derivatives platforms. As part of that, banks would no longer have to tie up money at the platforms’ two clearing houses because only one would be used for the combined derivatives platforms.

A shareholder vote on the deal was slated for July 7, Mr Niederauer revealed, while NYSE was set to provide details on the proposed savings at its annual meeting this week.

The comments come as NYSE seeks to defend its agreed deal against a break-up bid from Nasdaq and ICE, worth about 13 per cent more than the Deutsche Börse offer at current share prices.

The higher cost savings promised by Nasdaq and ICE have been a key sticking point and Mr Niederauer’s new forecast is aimed at allaying shareholders’ fears over the value of the Deutsche Börse deal.

In a video interview, Mr Niederauer also cast doubt on the savings proposed by Nasdaq and ICE, arguing they had underestimated the business that might be lost through their bid.

“When we did similar analyses of the competitive landscape, we think the revenue dis-synergies are understated,” said Mr Niederauer. “In fairness to them, they’re just looking at public filings. I have a feeling if they looked more closely, they’d find the expense synergies may be a bit exaggerated as well.”

Robert Greifeld, Nasdaq chief executive, said: “We have a strong track record of delivering on our synergy targets. We under-promise and over-deliver, and that’s what we expect to do this time.”

Mr Niederauer did not rule out sweetening the Deutsche Börse deal through special dividends or the promise of share buy-backs but said he remained confident the company could convince shareholders of the combination’s strategic merits.
